A color that hums.

I paint from what I live. A conversation overheard on the street, a strange dream, a film that stirs something up, a trip that gets under my skin, a morning spent outdoors. The work is autobiographical, with no grand thesis behind it: I want to enjoy painting, and I want whoever is looking to enjoy it too.

I work in oil, acrylic, spray, whatever the painting asks for. At first glance it looks clean: flat backgrounds, a color that hums. Up close it is full of imperfection, full of the hand. That charged palette comes from somewhere simple. I spend hours in front of screens, like everyone, and that chromatic scale has seeped into the way I see even the natural world.
